Overview of Flowers in the Attic

Flowers in the Attic is the first book in the Dollanganger series by Virginia Cleo Andrews. The story is told from the perspective of Cathy Dollanganger, a young girl who, along with her three siblings, is forced into hiding in the attic of her wealthy grandparents’ mansion. The novel opens with a family living in perfect happiness: the Dollanganger parents are beautiful, loving, and financially comfortable. However, their idyllic life shatters when the father dies in a car accident, leaving the family deep in debt. The mother, Corrine, decides to take her four children back to her wealthy parents’ estate, Foxworth Hall, where she hopes to inherit the family fortune. Her father, a strict and religious man, has disowned her for marrying her half-uncle, but Corrine believes she can win back his favor. To do so, she must hide the children — the living proof of her “sinful” marriage — in the attic. The children are promised that they will only have to stay for a short time, until their grandfather’s anger subsides. That short time stretches into years, and the attic becomes a prison of physical and emotional torment.

The “Flowers In The Attic Sparknotes” approach often highlights the novel’s deep psychological horror. The children – Chris, Cathy, and the twins Carrie and Cory – endure starvation, neglect, disease, and manipulation at the hands of both their grandmother and eventually their mother. The attic transforms from a temporary hiding place into a symbol of lost innocence and decay. Andrews uses lush, sometimes grotesque, imagery to explore how love curdles into obsession, and how hope can wither when the world outside remains unreachable.

Plot Summary: What Happens in the Attic?

To truly benefit from Flowers In The Attic Sparknotes, it is essential to understand the sequence of events. The story can be divided into four main phases: Arrival and Promise, Suffering and Adaptation, Desperation and Revolt, and the Escape and Betrayal.

Phase One: Arrival and Promise

After the father’s death, Corrine tells the children they are going to visit their grandparents at Foxworth Hall. The children have never met their grandfather, a man their mother describes as powerful and unforgiving. When they arrive, they are shocked by the grandeur of the mansion, but their grandmother, Olivia, immediately treats them with cold cruelty. She forces them to address her as “Olivia, your grandmother” and warns them that they are “God’s mistakes” because of the incestuous nature of their parents’ marriage. The children are led up to a dusty, windowed attic with two adjoining rooms and a locked door. Corrine swears that she will show them to her dying father only after she has softened his heart. She also promises to bring them food, books, and love. Initially, the children believe her. Cathy, the narrator, clings to her mother’s promise, even as the attic’s walls begin to close in.

Phase Two: Suffering and Adaptation

Days become weeks, then months. The grandmother brings meals that are increasingly meager and often poisoned with salt to make the children thirsty. She whips them for talking too loudly or for “sinful” behavior. Corrine’s visits become less frequent; she begins to wear expensive clothes and jewels, revealing that she is slowly being welcomed back into her father’s graces. The children adapt by creating routines, playing games, and studying using old encyclopedias found in the attic. The twins, initially cheerful, grow pale and thin. Cathy and Chris, the older siblings, become each other’s sole emotional support. The attic is both their prison and their home – they mark the passage of time by the seasons visible through the one small window. The most disturbing turning point is when Corrine brings them a special treat and is slowly revealed to be adding arsenic to their food, intending to kill them so she can retain her full inheritance.

Phase Three: Desperation and Revolt

As the years pass, the children’s health declines. Cory, the younger twin, becomes deathly ill. Cathy suspects their mother’s food is poisoned, but she cannot prove it. A doctor is called, but only to confirm Cory’s illness. Or so they think. The grandmother, who has become increasingly fanatical, announces that God is punishing the children for their mother’s sin. In a moment of revelation, Cathy realizes that the family wants them dead. She and Chris plan an escape, but first they must recover a stash of money their mother had hidden under a floorboard. The climax intensifies when the grandfather dies, leaving the entire estate to Corrine. Corrine’s final betrayal is complete when she denies Cory medical care, and the little boy dies in his sleep. Cathy and Chris, now adults in their late teens, resolve to flee with the remaining twin, Carrie. They fake their mother’s signature to gain access to the house’s bank accounts, gather their belongings, and leave Foxworth Hall in the middle of the night.

Phase Four: The Escape and Betrayal (Cliffhanger)

The novel ends on a deeply ambiguous and haunting note. The children escape, but their freedom is hollow. Carrie has been traumatized and barely speaks. Chris and Cathy have become involved in an incestuous relationship, a development that feels both shocking and inevitable given their years of isolation. The final sentence, “And then my life changed forever,” sets the stage for the sequels. The “Flowers In The Attic Sparknotes” often emphasize that the novel ends not with a resolution, but with a beginning of a new, even darker chapter. The children have survived, but their psychological wounds are permanent. The story is a masterclass in depicting how long-term confinement can warp a person’s sense of right and wrong, and how the need for love can become twisted into something destructive.

Major Characters and Their Roles

A proper “Flowers In The Attic Sparknotes” cannot ignore the characters who drive the horror. Each member of the Dollanganger family embodies a different aspect of the novel’s themes.

- Catherine “Cathy” Dollanganger: The protagonist and narrator. Cathy is fiery, rebellious, and fiercely protective of her siblings. Her transformation from a naive, beautiful girl into a hardened young woman is the heart of the novel. She is both victim and survivor, though her internal darkness grows as she becomes sexually active with her brother.
- Chris Dollanganger: The older brother, intelligent and responsible. Chris wants to become a doctor and tries to maintain order and morality. However, his love for Cathy eventually crosses a line. He represents the struggle between rationality and primal desire.
- Corrine Dollanganger (Winfield): The mother, a haunting figure of selfishness and betrayal. Corrine initially appears loving but gradually reveals her true nature as a woman who will sacrifice anyone for wealth and status. She is one of the most despised characters in literature precisely because she is so human – she does not start evil, but she allows greed to consume her.
- Olivia Winfield: The grandmother, a religious fanatic who believes the children are tainted by original sin. Her cruelty is cold and systematic; she sees herself as an instrument of God’s punishment. She is less a monster than a tragic figure trapped by her own rigid beliefs.
- Carrie and Cory: The innocent twins. Cory’s death is the ultimate symbol of the price of Corrine’s ambition. Carrie, though she survives, is broken. The twins represent the purest victims, voiceless in their suffering.

Key Themes Explored in the Novel

The enduring power of Flowers in the Attic lies in its exploration of universal themes through a grotesque lens. A good “Flowers In The Attic Sparknotes” will dissect these themes to show why the novel resonates decades after its release.

1. Betrayal of Trust: The central theme is the betrayal of parental love. Corrine actively poisons her children. The grandmother uses religion to justify abuse. The children are taught that adults cannot be trusted, a lesson that destroys their innocence.
2. Isolation and Entrapment: The attic is a physical and psychological prison. The children are cut off from the outside world, which leads to distorted perceptions of time, morality, and reality.
3. Forbidden Love / Incest: The relationship between Cathy and Chris is the novel’s most controversial element. Andrews portrays it not as titillation, but as a tragic consequence of being forced to rely on each other for all emotional and physical needs. It raises questions about where the line between love and survival lies.
4. Appearance vs. Reality: The dolls in the attic, the beautiful hair that the children keep long, the beautiful clothes Corrine wears—all mask the rot inside. The Foxworth mansion is a gilded cage.
5. Religious Hypocrisy: The grandmother’s faith is used to justify cruelty and neglect. The novel critiques how religion can be twisted to serve corrupt purposes.

Symbolism in Flowers in the Attic

Andrews fills her novel with potent symbols that even intermediate readers will notice. The Flowers In The Attic Sparknotes often highlight these to illuminate the deeper meaning.

- The Attic: A womb, a tomb, a prison. It represents the hidden shame of the family. The dusty, stifling space is the opposite of the open, sunlit world of normal childhood.
- The Dolls: Cathy and Chris find a box of antique dolls in the attic. The dolls are dressed in pristine clothing, but their porcelain faces are cracked. They mirror the children—outwardly beautiful but broken inside.
- Long Hair: The children are forced to keep their hair long and uncut for years as a condition of remaining in the attic. Hair becomes a symbol of time passing, of neglect, and later of their fading innocence. Cutting the hair at the end symbolizes a break from the past.
- Food and Poison: The gradual introduction of arsenic into the food shows how something that should nurture becomes deadly. The mother’s love is literally poisoned.
- The Sunlight: The single attic window facing the outside world represents both hope and despair. The children can see nature but cannot touch it. The unreachable beauty reflects their suffering.
